— Canadian Deputy Prime Minister Chrystia Freeland said on Monday that the federal government was taking a “cautious view” on any possible reopening of the U.S.-Canada border, which was closed to all non-essential travellers on midnight March 21 of this year in an effort to slow the spread of COVID-19, and that there is daily, “even hourly” monitoring of the border situation.

More than 5,000 Canadians have now died from the novel coronavirus, with cases topping 71,000.

By Tuesday afternoon, federal and provincial authorities said 5,169 had died from the virus, adding that at least 33,848 people had recovered. The total number of reported cases in the country was 71,415.

Quebec, the country's hardest-hit province, accounted for 3,013 COVID-19-related deaths in Canada. However, that could rise later Tuesday, as provincial daily numbers have not yet been released.

Ontario, the second worst-hit province, has seen 1,725 people die from the virus. A total of 15,391 people have recovered.

Several provinces, including Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, have announced some plans to ease restrictions and slowly reopen their provinces for business.

Despite the grim milestone, officials say the country's curve is flattening. Newfoundland and Labrador and P.E.I. haven't seen a new COVID-19 case in days, and the virus has yet to infect Nunavut.

Chief public health officer Theresa Tam said on May 2 that “by following public health recommendations, we have collectively brought down the rate of infection.”

More than one million people have been tested for the virus that causes COVID-19 in Canada so far.

How successfully are provinces flattening the curve?

This graph shows the growth trend of confirmed cases in each province since reaching its 100th confirmed case. Each province below reached this grim milestone at a different point in time. By placing these curves over one another, we can compare how successfully each province is combatting its outbreak.

Doubling rates are calculated from an average of growth rates over the past week. We compare this to the average growth trend over the previous week to see if growth rates are trending up or down. Data is plotted on a log scale. Provinces and territories are not listed in the above chart if they have fewer than 100 confirmed COVID-19 cases.

However, Trudeau has warned that Canada is still “not in the recovery phase yet,” adding that by reopening too soon, a second wave of COVID-19 infections could send Canadians “back into confinement this summer.”

“We are still in the emergency phase... The vast majority of Canadians will continue to need to be very careful,” he said.
